An Oklahoma state official announced Tuesday that, with the stroke of a pen, the state will ban most abortions after 12 weeks of pregnancy -- the point at which most abortions are performed in the U.S. State Health Director Dr. James Owens said the abortion deadline will be clear in the state's new abortion law as of June 1, and he expects it to be challenged in court. "There's a substantial difference between what the Constitution allows and what the law could allow," he told The Oklahoman newspaper. HHS WOMAN SUSPENDED AFTER CALLING ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS PORN 'PRETTY,' 'SEXY' Owens added that, in contrast to the current American law, which allows abortions up to 12 weeks into a pregnancy, the state law would allow abortions in those cases only if the woman's life is at risk or if the fetus is not viable. The new law is a direct challenge to the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Roe v. Wade in 1973 that established the right of women to obtain an abortion during the first trimester. In his interview, Owens was asked if he believes what is happening in Alabama and other states is part of a movement to turn back the clock on the landmark court ruling. "No, it's not about the time period," Owens responded. "It's really about the right of the individual to make their own choice." He said: "This statute really is about protecting life and dignity of the unborn child and the women who are pregnant." Owens also pointed to reports that the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) have found that abortions after 12 weeks of pregnancy are rare in the country. "There's a substantial difference between what the Constitution allows and what the law could allow." — Dr. James Owens, Oklahoma health director "What our researchers found was that in fact the reality was we have a very low incidence of abortions after 12 weeks of gestation," Owens said. "So really this is about protecting life and dignity of the unborn child." Owens said the state also will ban so-called medication-induced abortions, which he called "rather barbaric" in
